While there are Chinese troops in the region, these are outnumbered by the National People's Army (NPA),[52] which is directly under the Chinese Ministry of National Defense, and is the only armed force in Xinjiang. According to The Guardian, "in late July and early August 2008, the People's Liberation Army (PLA) deployed as many as 20,000 military and civilian personnel in 10 border garrisons in what the state media described as a "united front" to provide "front-line support" in the face of unrest by ethnic Uighurs in the western province of Xinjiang. In some places, PLA detachments with tanks and thousands of troops were deployed in front-line areas, said two officials, though the number of troops in each was undisclosed." [53] Beijing was able to take this strategic region because of its previous presence in the area. A group of Han Chinese officials claimed that the Xinjiang autonomous region was separated from China in the 14th century. Han Chinese invaded the region in 1683.[54] which resulted in the Qing conquest of the area. The Han Chinese, however, were a minority there, and lost control of the region in the following years to the Muslim Uighurs.[55] The Uighurs, who are of Turkic stock, live predominately in the southern portion of the province. The Uighur homeland, which is the area where they are concentrated, is located in the Karakoram Mountains. This area comprises the southwest portion of China's Qinghai and Xinjiang provinces [56] The Uighurs are Turkic speaking Muslims who make up the majority in the province. Their homeland is the southwest portion of China's Qinghai and Xinjiang provinces.[57][58] It is a mountainous region bordered to the south by the Pamir Mountains, in the northwest by the Karakoram range, in the east by the Kunlun Mountains, in the southeast by the Kunlun Mountains, and in the west by the Qilian Mountains. This region comprises the southwest portion of China's Qinghai and Xinjiang provinces.[59][56][58][57] The Xinjiang area 82157476af
